AMERICANS RESUME KNOCKOUT DRIVE ON SOUTHERN OKINAWA; IS LINKED WITH NEW SURPRISE LANDING ON NORTHERN MINDANAO; STRONG OFFENSIVE OPENED

Gains Scored Against The Japanese Forces' Naha Line

MARINES ON MOVE

9,469 "Japs" Slain Since Opening of Okinawa Invasion

By Gerard R. Himmelsbach
U. S. S. Foreign Writer

Assumption of the American knockout drive on southern Okinawa, linked with a new surprise landing by Gen. Douglas MacArthur's forces on northern Mindanao, highlighted the war against Japan today.

Fleet Adm. Chester W. Nimitz, in a regular communique, announced that the Marines and doughboys of the Tenth Army opened a strong offensive against the enemy's formidable Naha line, scoring gains up to 800 yards and capturing key heights and another important beach.

The Americans were closing rapidly on Naha city and Shuri town, both strongpoints in the Japanese defense system. Naha, largest city in the entire Ryukyu chain, forms the western anchor.

President's 92-Year-Old Mother Flies To Capital

By International News Service

Mother's Day, 1945, will be a very special one for Mrs. Martha Truman, a spry little lady from the lands of Missouri. Few are the number of mothers who live to see their son in the White House, and Mrs. Truman will fall that rare privilege tomorrow, the traditional day for honoring "Mom."

Now 92 but still gay and happy, Mrs. Truman rode in an airplane for the first time in her life to reach her son's side. It also was the first time that she ever had seen the nation's capital, as well as the first time she had seen her now world-famous son since his ascension to the nation's highest office.

Tomorrow will be a great day for the President's mother, and a proud one, too. She can look back over the long, lean years at Grandview, Mo., her privations and struggles of herself and her son from their humble beginning; those days are gone now, only a memory. She is now the nation's No. 1 mother.

Her companions on the flight from Grandview described her as a grand old lady, chipper and amazing. Mrs. Truman enjoyed it all, until the moment came when she got ready to step off the plane and saw the mob of reporters and photographers awaiting.

"Oh fiddlesticks," she said, like a true Missourian. "I'd known that wouldn't have come."

ATTENDS SEMINAR

Among the hundred practicing pharmacists from all over the country who attended a three-day professional seminar at the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy and Science from May 7 to May 9, was Asa Fabian, Bristol. The purpose of the seminar was to afford a means whereby those engaged in pharmacy might bring their professional knowledge up to date in a short period of time. The rapid progress in drugs and medical supplies occasioned by the war gave this session a special importance and usefulness.

During the three-day session, nine lectures were delivered by members of the College Faculty, and there were two question-and-answer periods.

EYES ON JAPAN

Now that Japan stands alone against a world demanding an end to war—a world with the might to enforce its demands—it remains to be seen if there will be a deterioration of the Japanese will to resist. When her Axis partners were riding high the Japanese may have had no doubts concerning the outcome. But with Italy a quitter and Germany destroyed, the future cannot present a rosy hue even to the most fanatical Jap.

It is no secret that Allied might which brought victory in Europe, with the possible exception of Russian armies, is to be added to the large forces now carrying the fight to Japan. The help of Russia could shorten the struggle in the Pacific many months, but without it Japan will be soundly whipped, and at a not too far distant date.

Here will be an opportunity for a comparison between the Teutonic and Oriental attitude toward defeat. The Germans fought on for weeks after they knew defeat was inevitable. They sacrificed thousands of lives, saw their country destroyed, rather than quit. Will the Japs display that sort of fanaticism? Or will they try to save something from a situation which will inexorably result in a fate similar to that which befell their Axis partners?

BACK TO THE FARM!

From Prof. Oliver E. Baker, who teaches economic geography at the University of Maryland, comes an expression of dissent to a view that has won some support among certain observers of the American scene. He does not concur in the theory that returning war veterans will flock to the farms.

Speaking before the Academy of World Economics at Washington, Professor Baker went so far as to say that farm boys who have seen the world in the armed services may prove to be a "lost generation" as far as agriculture is concerned. Given a taste of urban prosperity, he declared, they will not go back to the country.

It is not exactly a case of "How ya gonna keep 'em down on the farm after they've seen Parris?" to quote a morose song of World War I. Professor Baker based his prediction on cold economic facts. In 1932, he said, about half of the nation's farms produced less than $600 worth of products, including those consumed by farm families, and veterans simply will not be satisfied with such an income as long as they can do better in the cities.

This sounds persuasive, and it is true that there has been a wartime population drift to the cities of the East, the Lake States and the West Coast that may accentuate the problem of manning the farms. But it will be noted that Professor Baker based his forecast on the assumption that there will be plenty of urban jobs. He may have underestimated the great changes that will come with peace.

Besides, farm income has increased during the war years and promises to stay high for several years. Farm living is more attractive than it was formerly.

ROMANTIC MASQUERADE
by MARIE BLIZARD

CHAPTER FIFTEEN
Daphne felt very confident as she lingered over her breakfast and her thoughts, and then she remembered Mrs. Gates. She was to call for her at eleven.

Steve usually came about 1 p. m. She must be very careful now. It wouldn't do at all to have the village know that Mrs. Daphne Willoughby Abruzzi was courting her gardener. The fact that her intentions couldn't have been more honorable wouldn't help at all.

Daphne got into a lemon-colored wool frock, tied a bandana over her hair and put on her rain coat. Before she went downstairs, she carried a bowl of bright-lined minnias from her own room into the west bedroom. She stopped downstairs long enough to light a fire. Everything must look nice and cheery for Mrs. Gates. Everything must be as nice for everyone else as it was for Daphne herself. She would like to have stood on the steps of the City Hall and tossed gold pieces about.

If Daphne had a qualm about anyone that morning, she would have been uneasy about Mrs. Amelia Gates, and if there weren't canaries singing their heads off in her heart, it would have been heavy.

The days of her privacy were over.

But Mrs. Gates, Daphne decided during their brief ride from the Holly's home, was going to be all right. She was Scotch, friendly, not loquacious. She was neither tiresomely grateful over what Daphne had done, nor sentimental over her son. She launched into no confidences when Daphne came upon her unpacking her small trunk and setting up her gallery of family photographs.

She said directly, "The green tomatoes in the kitchen ought to be put up at once. I'll get at them this afternoon. Soon's I get my things put away I'll see what's needed."

Daphne stood in the doorway. "There's a box of mason jars in the cellar."

Mrs. Gates tied on a large white apron. "I'd best get them now. They'll need to be scalded."

"It's a heavy box, Mrs. Gates. You couldn't carry it up, but Steve . . . that's my man," Daphne swallowed hard—"that is, the man who helps around here. He'll be here soon. You ask him to bring up the box. And anything else you want done, I'm sure he'll be glad." Daphne felt as if she were smothering. Then she left, saying, "You'll find things for your lunch. I'll be out the rest of the day."

It was better to go to Red Cross—much better than going hot and cold because Steve was around, and making an idiot of herself when she'd tell him she had something to say to him. She had plenty to say, but she wouldn't say it. Daphne feared she would babble and bleat like a school-girl asking a handsome professor why he couldn't see she was languishing for him.

So Daphne went to Red Cross where she spent most of the day. Later she went shopping for such important things as two-cent stamps, and a packet of needles and a bottle of iodine, and then, unable to stay away a moment longer, drove home swiftly and walked into her house as the clock struck six. Something delicious was cooking, but it was not chili sauce.

"I'll have to make it tomorrow, Miss Daphne," Mrs. Gates explained, "I couldn't find the jars in the cellar."

"Why didn't you ask Steve about them?" Daphne thought her voice sounded perfectly natural. "He's probably put them away somewhere."

"There's nary a man been here today, lass," declared Mrs. Gates, shaking her head.

"I see," Daphne walked towards the door, her lower lip between her teeth.

"Is the hired man supposed to come every day?" asked Mrs. Gates.

"Yes," Daphne replied. "He's supposed to work here every day." Mrs. Gates finally observed that you couldn't depend on any hired man these days, adding, "I'll give him a piece of my mind when he comes around."

"No," said Daphne, with a peculiarly merciless smile, "I'll give him a piece of mine—if he ever comes back."

"Does he drink, ma'am?" "I don't think so."

"You owe him any money?" "Only four days' wages."

"If you owe him money, he'll be back."

"I wonder," Daphne said to herself.

Serving Daphne the first real meal she'd had in her house in some time, Mrs. Gates observed, "The wind's up again. Looks like the rain and wind's never going to stop. Minds me of autumn in Cornwall."

Yes, the wind was up again, moaning around the house. And the shutter began its insistent banging again.

After dinner, Daphne went into the living-room and picked up a book, and was fifty pages into it, without remembering a word she'd read, when she heard a new sound through the racket of the storm. It was a faint hammering somewhere in back of the house.

A slow smile spread over Daphne's face. She listened, put down her book, went into the hall, and donned her raincoat. She stopped long enough to get a flashlight, then went out onto the back porch, opening the door softly.

It circled Steve in glistening raincoat, hammer in hand, standing at the top of the ladder. He blinked and tried to peer below.

"Won't you come into my parlor," she inquired sweetly.

"Thanks," Steve replied, returning to his job. "I don't need the light. I'm accustomed to the dark. Anyway, the job's nearly done."

"When you come down, I want to talk to you," Daphne said tartly as she reentered her house.

A minute or two later, she was standing with her back to the hearth, her hands clasped behind her, when Steve came to the arch of the living-room. Mrs. Gates was taking out her coffee tray.

"Mrs. Gates, this is Steve," Daphne said.

Mrs. Gates nodded and when she left the room, he asked, "Your chaperone?"

"My housekeeper."

"You wished to talk with me?" "I did."

"I said I'd fix the blind. It's fixed." He paused, then said, "I'm leaving, quitting the job—Mrs. Abruzzi. My work here is finished. The wood's in. The garden laid down."

"There are other things," Daphne suggested, "there was the refinishing of the playroom in the cellar, but . . ."

"But?"

"But if you don't wish to work here anymore, that's up to you. Right now I don't have enough cash in the house, but I'll leave your wages with Mrs. Gates tomorrow."

"Thank you. The man could incline his head an inch and make it appear a courtly gesture."

"Wait!" She turned her back when she heard him stop. "I . . . Steve . . . last night . . . If that's the reason . . ."

"It's a good reason, isn't it?" he asked quietly.

Daphne kicked the embers with her slipper. "I need help and you need work. There isn't any reason why we shouldn't forget . . ."

"I don't agree with you."

"I'm sorry it happened . . . then." "I'm sorry, too. I completely lost my head. I apologize."

"Please don't." She worked so hard to keep her voice in check, to keep Steve from hearing the tears in it, that she spoke tightly, coldly.

"If you think you need someone to look after your place, or your fires . . ."

"Yes," she said eagerly.

"I'll send one of the Bronner boys around. Good night, Madam."

Steve went without so much as a backward glance at her, and was probably half way home when what he had said struck her and she ran through the hall to call him back.

He was not Steve Bronner! Then who was he?

Today's Quiet Moment

By P. Paul Freeman
Minister of Cornwells and Wilkinson
Memorial Methodist Churches

Our Gracious Heavenly Father, we turn from the toil and care of the day to meditate and lift our hearts in prayer to Thee. We thank Thee for the blessing of Thy presence with us all the days and weeks of life. May we never fail to sense Thy Spirit at work in the world. Make our hearts joyful through hope, our minds and hearts transformed by Thy love.

Bless the sad and lonely, unite us with those we love. May the wanderers find their way to Thee, may the outcast and the sinner be reclaimed by Thy grace. Inspire us all to seek Thy favor, leave us not alone. And may the blessing of God the Father, the love of Christ, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit, abide with us now and forever. Amen.

Mrs. William DiNunzio, Dorrance street, spent Saturday to Monday in Seaside, N. J.

Mrs. Peter Brescia, Logan street, has been a patient in St. Francis Hospital, Trenton, N. J.

Carol Ann Nicol, Jackson street, spent two days last week at Seaside, N. J.

PW CANDIDATE
SCRANTON, Pa.—(INS)—Lt. Col. T. Linnas, Hoban was expected to be a candidate for re-election to the Lackawanna county common pleas bench while sitting behind the barbed wire of a prison camp in Brunswick, Germany. Democrats have announced plans to launch a "sticker" or write in campaign for the imprisoned jurist.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.—(INS)—Enemy fighters explode—just like they do in the movies. Take the word of Capt. Alvard Hunter, P-47 pilot now at AAF Redistribution Station No. 1 after a tour of duty with the 5th Air Force. He shot down five over New Guinea and the Philippines. "The first one I got blew up right in my face," said the Plessia, N. Y., ace.
